I'm a huge sci-fi fan, and I would love to create a TV show about the future. In the future, Earth is on the brink of disaster, and the government collapses (maybe because of a major catastrophe). When the government collapses, the people begin to build spaceships and travel to other galaxies. In my new show, there is a central government that is just barely holding up. This government could be overthrown by a coup, or perhaps an alien invasion. The government has a large number of science a1d647c40b

A group of Google employees who spend much of their time working on products that help people in the developing world have been fired or laid off, my colleague Alex Abad-Santos reported today. Eight staffers, all based out of Google's YouTube offices in California, reported in a Friday memo that they were the target of a reorganization that they described as an "unprecedented attack on people working on the Google.org portfolio." So it's too early to think about how political fortunes might change if Santorum, should he bow out of the race, runs for the Senate from the south (he's a South Carolinian). But one thing is clear: Should Santorum make the jump, it would be a big blow to Romney. If Santorum does well (not that we think he will, but let's assume he does), Santorum's campaign can be divided into two separate parts: the part that is about Romney and the part that is about Santorum. The first part is the part that focuses on Romney's limitations as a candidate, the second is the part that tries to explain the nature of a man who is attractive to both conservatives and moderates in the primary. And the obvious way to make the case that Romney is a weak candidate is to focus on the biggest weakness that he's about to face: his time as a governor. Before Romney was a candidate for president, he was governor of Massachusetts. What does that tell you about a candidate's strengths
