At any given moment the voltage ranges from 0.5V to 0.6V. The voltage is correct for a second or two after I connect the battery to the pins, then all of a sudden it starts jumping all over the place, with voltage as high as 1.2V, and then at intervals as low as 0.5V. The first time I tested the system, the voltage on the pins started at 0.55V and jumped to 0.75V. At first I had this circuit attached to a multimeter to see if the circuit was handling the power properly, but realized it would be difficult to reach the other end of a split secondary. I tried changing the values of C1, C2, R1, and R2, to try to account for the voltage spikes I was seeing from the microcontroller. I could not find a good value of R1 and R2 that would affect the 0-1 volt range. I came up with a voltage divider with resistors of value 30k and 100k. The proper voltage range I was trying to achieve is 0-1V, but the system was chattering, so I'm not sure if I found the correct values. I tried to make a circuit diagram of what's happening but I couldn't figure out what was happening in the circuit. Any help would be appreciated. Thank you. A: Is the value of R3 changing when the peak voltage is dropping? If so you're not selecting a divider ratio that keeps this R3 across the correct range when the battery is low. Based on your example circuit you want the series capacitor to have a voltage rating of $V_1 + V_{peak}$ where V_1 is the battery voltage. The value of C2 should be proportional to this. You say you have chosen a 20-30k resistor for this R3, and 0.2uF for C2. If this
