I have an NSMutableArray, and I am adding a sub-array to it inside a method called insertObject: (it is called on an instance of the class, and I do not know the source of the object). If I do the following (printing out the contents of the array to check) then everything works fine: -(void)myMethod:(NSString *)className { [self.myMutableArray insertObject:className]; } However, when I add some code to debug this method, I get a "unexpectedly found nil while unwrapping an Optional value" on the insertObject line. -(void)myMethod:(NSString *)className { [self.myMutableArray insertObject:className]; [className print]; } So, here's my question: What do I have to do to add an object to my array, and avoid this "unexpected nil" error? A: Calling -[NSMutableArray insertObject:]. You need to decide what should happen when that method is called. Is the method expecting something to be there or is it returning nil or returning nil and setting an error? If it is a method which sets an error then you need to check the error before calling insertObject: on the NS

I've found that if I use the following regex then the string can be divided into two parts based on the hyphen (this is good): txt.replaceFirst("^-", ""); However, the characters in the string are not in order, and some of the strings contain a leading hyphen but some don't: string01-string02-string03 I was hoping to get the string divided into two groups, where the hyphen is in the first group and the string in the second group. Thus the desired result for the first example above would be: string01string02string03 whereas for the second example it would be: string01-string02-string03 Can anyone help with a regex that would do this? UPDATE: I have tried replacing (^\\s)(.)-(.)?(=\\s) with '${2}' where ${2} should be put in the $2 variable, but I am getting an error: Pattern compile: [^\s\\-\d+].-([^\s\\-\d+].)(?=\s) Matcher: [^\s\\-\d+].-([^\s\\-\d+].)\s0: $1-$2 A: The tricky part is to define the beginning and the end of the result, if it is a single line, you can solve this problem with the following regex : string01-string02-string03\s This will preserve the whitespaces and the hyphens on the right of the string. You can replace this regex by : string01-string02-string03 You'll need to split the string on - first in a separate group and then on the final hyphen in a second group. Here is a sample code :
